Dear Sarah,

I found your recent piece on the best ways for greetings this Halloween season to be very fascinating and well thought out. Much like your entire catalog, your coverage of lifestyle and holiday seasons is second to none and gives the reader much clarity into how to approach the holiday season.

With all of this being said, I think you would take a great interest in what Smith & Jones Greeting Cards is doing this upcoming St. Patrick's Day season. We plan to launch a new catalog of cards for this upcoming season, which contains the same seasonal whimsy as your articles. We feel as if your ideals in what to report align much to what we sell to our communities.

The audience for Today is one that loves to plan and anticipate for the holiday season. Smith & Jones Greeting Cards is providing a new wave of anticipation that your readers come to your landing page to expect. The majority of your audience ranges 25-50 years old (Verity), so plenty of parents and families will look to see how they can bring the holiday spirit come March.

There are many different directions a story regarding this could go in. One angle that could pique the audience's interest: how one can level up their St. Patrick's celebration in 2027. This angle, like much of the other stories written, takes your listing methods to the St. Patrick's celebration realm.

Any coverage, and especially coverage including what is going on at Smith & Jones Greeting Cards, could have mutual benefits. It is our belief that many values align between us.

We can provide many options to begin said coverage, such as sending over the catalog of cards for you to inspect and review. If you would like to contact our CEO, COO, or any other stakeholders, we would be more than happy to get you connected. If you would like to see beyond what we are doing for St. Patrick's Day, I am happy to push you in the right direction to fulfill said request.

Let me know your interest levels and how we can move forward with this!
